THE VOLPI FIZZLE.
"Arma virtutis cano!" Glad to see you! said the Hon. E. Monson, British Minister at Montevideo, on Thursday afternoon, as the now famous Volpi stepped on shore. The Italian bowed, and the 5000 Hesper-ians on the mole cheered like madmen. H. M. representative took Mr.
Volpi by the arm and showed him to his carriage, which at once dashed off to the British Legation. Had Volpi been an Irishman, our country's representative could not have treated him with greater courtesy.
On the way to the Legation Volpi apologized to the Minister for the unavoidable absence of his friend Patroni, who was laid up with a bad attack of gout, on board the Canciolo. Here the dense crowd that followed the Minister's carriage showed signs of giving a cheer for Commander Amegaza, but with a dignified wave of his hand, worthy of Garibaldi, Volpi restored silence.
On reaching the British Legation, the guest of the day and the United States, French and Spanish Ministers and the Italian Vice Consul sat down to lunch. Grace was hardly pronounced, before there was a fearful shindy at the door, which Volpi's countrymen in the street attempted to force, but it was very properly slammed in their faces. Before lunch was over, the Argentine Minister joined the conclave, and soon after, Mr. Peace, agent of the Government, was bowed in, declaring that he came in the cause of good will; he handed a paper to Mr. Monson, who at once read it to his colleagues. It was a polite note from Dr. Castillo, the Criminal Judge, saying that as the British Legation must be considered foreign territory, he declined to go there to examine Volpi or any other man.
The diplomatists then withdrew to a "cuarto intermedio" to consult.

THE VOLPI FIZZLE.
"Arma virtutis cano!" Glad to see you! said the Hon. E. Monson,
British Minister at Montevideo, on
Italian bowed, and the 5000 Hesper-
ians on the mole cheered like mad-
men. H. M. representative took Mr.
ed off to the British Legation. Had Volpi been an Irishman, our coun-
treated him with greater courtesy.
apologized to the Minister for the
unavoidable absence of his friend
attack of gout, on board the Can-
ciolo. Here the dense crowd that
followed the Minister's carriage
dignified wave of his hand, worthy
of Garibaldi, Volpi restored silence.
On reaching the British Legation,
the guest of the day and the United States, French and Spanish Minis-
a fearful shindy at the door, which
properly slammed in their faces. Be-
Minister joined the conclave, and
ing that he came in the cause of
good will; he handed a paper to
Mr. Monson, who at once read it to
from Dr. Castillo, the Criminal Judge, saying that as the British Le-
examine Volpi or any other man.
to a "cuarto intermedio" to consult.
